The medicalization thesis, the re-labeling or redefining of a personal or social problem as a medical condition thus requiring therapeutic intervention, has become the focus of a number of recent works. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, researchers, mostly social scientists, were studying issues surrounding social control and a range of human problems that had come under medical jurisdiction.

The Medicalization of Everyday Life. "Psychiatry is medicalization, through and through. Whatever aspect of psychiatry psychiatrists claim is not medicalization, is not medicalization only if it deals with proven disease, in which case it belongs to neurology, neuroanatomy, neurophysiology, neurochemistry, neuropharmacology, or neurosurgery, not psychiatry."

The Medicalization of Everyday Life | The BMJ

19 DECEMBER 2007. The Medicalization of Everyday Life. Although medicalization encompasses more than psychiatry, we must be clear about one thing: Psychiatry is medicalization through and through. Whatever aspect of psychiatry psychiatrists claim is not medicalization, is not medicalization only if it deals with proven disease, in which case it belongs to neurology, neuroanatomy, neurophysiology, neurochemistry, neuropharmacology, or neurosurgery, not psychiatry.
