Metaphor and Thought. Ortony, Andrew, Ed. In the essays contained in this volume, philosophers, psychologists, linguists, and educators raise questions about the viability of the traditional distinction between the literal and the metaphorical. The essays reflect important parallel developments in the fields represented but also illustrate a convergence of approaches to a common problem by different disciplines.

ERIC - ED182771 - Metaphor and Thought., 1979-Sep-27

The constructivist approach seems to entail an important role for metaphor in both language and thought, but it also tends to undermine the distinction between the metaphorical and literal. Because, for the constructivist, meaning has to be constructed rather than directly perceived, the meaning of nonliteral uses of language does not constitute a special problem.
