Gravity is one of those things we take completely for granted. And there are two things about it that we take for granted: the fact that it is always there, and the fact that it never changes. If the Earth's gravity were ever to change significantly, it would have a huge effect on nearly everything because so many things are designed around the current state of gravity.

"What if there were a stack overflow on..." because it is not true. It's a condition that is contrary-to-fact. If it were talking about something true that had occurred in the past, then "was" would be appropriate, but the "what if" automatically triggers a condition so it's in definite need of the subjunctive.

Which is correct: "what if there was" or "what if there were"?

If there was no friction, there would be no force slowing down motion when two objects rubbed against one another. A moving ball would stop if it hit a boulder, but without friction it would roll forever along a flat street. No matter how hard a driver jammed on the brakes, his car would not come to a stop, because brake pads rely on friction.

If there were no bees, our food supply would be less varied and less available. While we might not go extinct, we would certainly need to find edible alternatives to many of the mainstay foods we currently enjoy -- particularly those crops dependent on bees for pollination -- and figure out ways to stave off economic hardship and famine until new cultivation methods could be developed.
